But do you know how you can have both? As business owners, we realize the benefits of having an office, even a virtual one, but we're also familiar with the drawbacks. Our decision to downsize from a 100,000-square-foot office in South Dakota to a 4,000-square-foot virtual office in San Francisco was a difficult one. In retrospect, it's clearly the better choice, as we feel more connected to our clients and better able to deliver the results we promised when we first started this business many years ago. But while working out of a home office might be the answer for some, it's not for all business owners. And the benefits of an office aren't just limited to the aesthetic benefits and break room amenities they offer. One of our business partners actually works from his home office but eventually has found that he needs a more formal environment with refreshments and a more conducive environment to work in. The benefits of an office are largely psychological in nature, so it's important to figure out what issues arise for you when your office and your business aren't working together. Offices are an integral part of what we do in our business. If you're a freelancer, a corporate employee, or a solopreneur, chances are you work out of an office or a physical space every day. If your business is small, you can probably rent an office or work out of a coworking space. But this won't always be an option for everyone. And e79caf774b
