nerve in a 5-year-old patient]. Tuberculous optic neuritis is an uncommon form of tuberculous infection. Its most common manifestation is papillitis. Its clinical presentation is often nonspecific, and thus, a high index of suspicion for diagnosis is mandatory. The most common signs and symptoms include blurred vision and ptosis. Diagnosis is based on clinical findings and radiological features. This article describes the case of a 5-year-old child with optic neuritis due to tuberculous infection. The invention relates generally to computing systems, and more particularly to managing system resources in a computing system. An enterprise may use a computing system to process and store data. Different resources such as storage, memory, central processing units (CPUs), and various other types of resources may be used by the enterprise in order to store, process, and send and/or receive information from one another. One or more of these resources may not be available when a request or task to be performed by the enterprise is submitted, for example, due to bandwidth limitations, a failure of some part of the system, a power outage, etc. In some computing systems, functions such as failover, migration, and/or recovery processes are used to reallocate resources in a computing system.

Q: What would happen if a person in deep space flew into the black hole that forms a neutron star? I'm looking at Wikipedia articles on Sagittarius A\* and M87 (the galaxy's black hole). It seems that if you flew into a black hole it would create a neutron star. Would the neutron star then collapse on itself or would there be two black holes? Would there be some effect on its environment around it? How would one spot it? A: A  $10M_{\odot}$  neutron star would appear to collapse into a black hole of mass less than  $1M_{\odot}$  before the event horizon was reached. If the neutron star's rotational energy is  $\approx 4 \times 10^{53}$  ergs, then it would generate a Lorentz factor of  $\gamma \approx 4 \times 10^{11}$  for a black hole with  $M=1M_{\odot}$ .
