A number of prior art methods have been devised to bend metal or other malleable materials into desired shapes. For example, a press bending method is disclosed in the U.S. Pat. No. 4,187,757 issued Feb. 5, 1980 to Williams et al. In the Williams et al patent, a strip or strand of metal is placed between two shaping surface members and a drive assembly is then operated to cause a mechanical bending of the metal strip into a desired configuration. While the press bending method of the Williams patent is capable of providing uniform bending of strands or sheets of metal of varying thickness, it does not function to uniformly bend bar members of the type described below. Another prior art bending method is disclosed in the U.S. Pat. No. 3,400,932 issued Sept. 10, 1968 to Tinkham et al. This prior art patent teaches a method for bending metal strips by pulling the strip through a pair of rolling devices which have a non-uniform bending surface. The method of the Tinkham patent, as the name implies, is applicable to the bending of metal strip into a bended configuration. However, the method of the Tinkham patent has many drawbacks and deficiencies including the inability to uniformly bend metal bar members into their desired configuration with a bending rig of appropriate size. The inability of the Tinkham patent method to produce uniformly bent metal bar members is due to the fact that the rolling surfaces of the device of the Tinkham patent are non-uniform and generally exhibit an irregular shape. Yet another prior art method for producing a bended metal bar member is disclosed in the U.S. Pat.

No. 3,392,982 issued July 9, 1968 to Ruff et al. The Ruff patent is directed to an apparatus and method for bending a metal blank into a desired configuration. The Ruff et al apparatus and method are capable of producing a uniformly bent bar member, but the Ruff et al device also possesses many disadvantages and drawbacks due to the nature of its construction. For example, it is clear that the Ruff et al apparatus is not adaptable for bending metal bar members into a uniform bended configuration. The Ruff et al device is specifically constructed to be utilized in conjunction with a U-shaped metal bar member to produce
