1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to packaging and more particularly, it relates to a stretchable container and a method of sealing of stretchable containers for presenting consumer products in a taut condition while permitting air to circulate through the container. 2. Description of the Prior Art Dispensers of consumer products such as hand lotion, lip balm, nail polish and the like often are packaged in an air-tight stretchable container so as to provide even distribution of the product to the consumer and to prevent drying of the product and darkening of the packaging as the container is stretched. Typically, such containers are stretchable over a relatively wide range and, when filled, have an elastic stretch factor of at least 25% and the elastic modulus of the stretchable container is at least about 500 psi. A metal or plastic ring, called a lip seal, is conventionally disposed at the neck of the container, and the lip seal is bonded to the top edge of the sidewall of the container at the top of the stretchable container. The open top is sealed with a cap over the top of the lip seal. Two principal problems with conventional stretchable containers include 1) distortion of the container during container loading, which distortion causes misalignment of product and/or increased time and expense of product placement during filling and cap application, and 2) leakage of air from the container during filling and during product use. There are a number of patents directed to this type of container including U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,960,953 and 6,471,821. U.S. Pat. No. 5,960,953 discloses a stretchable container having a neck that may be fitted with a cap and, if the cap is not used, the container neck is loosely secured to the top of the container body. The stretchable container of U.S. Pat. No. 6,471,821 is similar to that of U.S. Pat. No. 5,960,953 except that the neck includes a resilient annular rim on its top end, which rim extends around the periphery of
