What's new:

(Upbeat Supercargo album) Diesel Attack is the fourth studio album by the American punk rock band Upbeat Supercargo, released in 1981 on the independent record label that the band had set up in England. The album marks the first not to feature saxophonist/vocalist Bob Weston on vocals; instead, vocal duties are taken by Frank Agnello. The band's musical direction had already been altered by its changing line up, but were brought into the future here by changes in Agnello's personal life, as he became a devout Catholic at this time. He also had encountered the equally devout Joseph "Yo! Ho Ho! Wow!" West while living in California during the US punk rock boom, and his outspoken faith was an influence on the album. Speaking about his reasons for leaving the band, Weston said that he wasn't too fond of the new direction that were eventually taken by the band and wanted to start "breathing fresh air". He also remembers that there were plans to do an international tour with the band, but this had to be cancelled when both himself and his wife left for the UK. Weston did return to sing on one final Upbeat Supercargo album, The King of Rock 'n' Roll, while Agnello only remained with the band for the rest of its tours and never recorded another album. The recording sessions for Diesel Attack took place during 1980 at Morgan Studios in London and at the band's own studio in New York City. The album contains thirteen songs, all written by the band, two of which – "Rival Bikes" and "Champions of the Bodies" – were released as singles. "Gotta Need a Quarter" was originally titled "So Excited", but the name was soon changed upon the band's discovery that their record label licensed the rights to use the song from another band, who were called "The So Excited". The two sides of "I Don't Work Now" appeared on the band's debut album, Upbeat Supercargo. The title of the album itself was borrowed from an episode of Danger Mouse and was written on the front cover, illustrated by David Townsend, with an image of a motorcycle bearing the band's logo. Diesel Attack charted at number 44 on the US Billboard Album Rock chart. It was first re-released as part of The Old School Rock Revival in 2011, then in remastered form in 2015 by Rhino Entertainment. History The band's line
