Loss of hand function caused by acute mesenchymal cell transplantation into the distal stumps of cutaneous innervated grafts in mice. Transplantation of stem cells into the distal stumps of peripheral nerve grafts could promote functional recovery after limb amputation. Our previous work has shown that expanded multipotent mesenchymal stromal cells (MSCs) transplantation into the distal stumps of the sciatic nerve grafts could promote axon regeneration. In this study, we aimed to determine if transplantation of MSCs into the distal stumps of cutaneous innervated grafts could promote better functional recovery after partial limb amputation in mice. The distal stumps of the nerve grafts were autologous, and the MSCs were either differentiated into neurons (MSCneurons) or fibroblasts (MSCfibroblasts). Each mouse received a femoral nerve cutaneous graft, the distal nerve stumps of which were bridged by an end-to-side neurorrhaphy with a distal nerve segment from the contralateral side. After 4 weeks, the mice were randomly assigned to a control group (n=8) or to a cell transplantation group (n=11). The forelimb function was examined using the open field, automated gait analysis, and the Hargreaves test. On the basis of our data, MSCneurons showed better recovery in the bff6bb2d33

Loading...Organized by the Coordinating Center for Eastern Universities and the Archives of the United States, the workshop will explore the nature of early American studies and its disciplines, its rationale and justification, and its applications to various types of intellectual, societal, and philosophical dilemmas. The oldest discipline in American studies is American history, but there are many other subdisciplines and research topics that have all developed from early American studies. These include historiography, American literature, American politics, American social history, social and cultural history, American studies of religion, American studies of the experience of colonial Americans, and studies of African-Americans in America. The issues being examined at the workshop include the status of early American studies; the sources and standard concepts in early American studies; and its growing role in teaching and scholarship at the undergraduate level. The workshop will consist of discussion sessions, paper presentations, and panel sessions.

Brain imaging studies evaluating cortical thickness are usually restricted to a particular cortical region. Recently, an increasing number of studies, both human and animal, suggest that the neuroanatomical properties of cortical regions are not randomly organised across the cortex and that cortical regions differ in properties that are unrelated to their local function. Specifically, for example, the peak value of the Gaussian distribution of neuronal density, as measured by either single-neuron recording or local field potentials, co-varies across cortical regions, and the balance between excitation and inhibition also varies. These findings imply that a higher ratio of excitation to inhibition is associated with efficient detection of stimulus onset as well as higher signal-to-noise in the cortical network. The main purpose of this study was to use cortical thickness analysis to test the hypothesis that well-connected areas within the visual cortex are enriched with excitatory neurons and higher-order cortical areas are associated with more inhibitory neurons. Based on the guidelines for processing and interpretation of voxel-based morphometry (VBM) data, we directly compared cortical thickness in well-connected and less-connected cortical regions within the visual cortex. This was done using the standardised matched pairs t-test of SPM99 (Statistical Parametric Mapping; Wellcome Department of Cognitive Neurology, Institute of Neurology, UCL, London, UK). These measurements suggest that the well-connected cortical regions are associated with more excitatory neurons per mm³, whereas less
