[end_description]For the third time in less than three months, a New York City police officer has shot and killed an unarmed man in routine traffic stops. It was a tragic but predictable consequence of the NYPD's "stop-and-frisk" policy, which, despite the decision in late 2013 to curtail it, remains central to the way the department does business. All three of the dead men — nine-year-old Eric Garner in Staten Island, an unarmed teen named Ramarley Graham in the Bronx, and an unarmed man named Tony Robinson in Manhattan — were initially stopped not for any apparent crime but for jaywalking or, in the case of Graham, for allegedly running from police. Advertisement: The specific details and the time-frame of each stop were, in fact, important factors in the lives of these three men who all died of what appear to be causes unrelated to the melee. "In the past New York City police officers
