The yeast two-hybrid approach to the study of human steroid hormone receptors: a method for the localization of domains for receptor-interacting proteins. In previous studies, we demonstrated that the steroid receptors for estrogen, progesterone and glucocorticoid were capable of activating transcription of a SV40 early promoter in yeast (Matsushita, T., Ikeda, K., and Hibi, M. (1990) J. Biol. Chem. 265, 14036-14041). In the current work, we have used a yeast two-hybrid system to discover novel steroid receptor interacting proteins. We cloned human steroid receptors for estrogen, progesterone, and glucocorticoid and used the respective steroid receptor domains to screen a human placenta cDNA library. From the above experiments, we obtained several clones encoding proteins with regions closely related to the known domains of the respective steroid receptors. In subsequent experiments, we identified five steroid receptor interacting proteins. Two of these (heat shock protein 90 beta and protein phosphatase 2a) are known to interact with the steroid receptors. A new protein (roi/Kir), associated with the prolactin receptor, was also identified. The five newly discovered proteins are: roi/Kir, a yeast protein homologous to the mammalian proteins Syp and Interleukin-2-receptor beta subunit; staufer, a phosphatidylinositol-binding protein; AF-2, a human protein homologous to the yeast protein Ypt1; and two new heat shock protein 90 alpha isoforms. The latter proteins may be involved in targeting the receptors to the nuclear envelope. The amino acid sequence similarities of these proteins to known proteins and the location of the proteins within the cell are briefly discussed. The Ashihara Book of Light. This book is designed as a general introduction to art, architecture, and nature. The first part addresses questions about light, the second deals with light in space, and the third with light in nature. The center of the book addresses the phenomenological study of light, just as the center of a building is the place where the people live. "Light: an Introduction to Nature". The Ashihara Book of Light. By Yoshinobu Ashihara. San Francisco: Sierra Club Books, 1982. 1. 1030 pp. Light, form, and space: an introduction to nature. By Yoshinobu Ashihara. New York: E.P. Dutton, 1982. The first book ever written on how light is used in nature and in architecture. Canvas drawing without displaying it (actionsript 3.0) I am new to actionsript and I came across with this question. I've found that I can draw on a canvas with: Canvas(stage).width = 800; Canvas(stage).height = 500; This is how the canvas is displayed. However I am wondering is it possible to redraw the same canvas while not displaying it and draw onto that canvas?

In other words how to hide the canvas and still have it visible? A: You can draw on the canvas but you'll need to draw on the BitmapData directly. The Canvas class is designed to paint on its children directly. The Canvas class does not itself contain any displayable content (unless you're using the display objects provided by the stage class). Instead, the Canvas class is used only as a container object, along with the other stage objects. The Canvas class, then, is intended for painting on your content, not displaying it on a Display List. // create a new BitmapData from the stage var bd:BitmapData = new BitmapData(stage.width, stage.height, true, 0xFFFFFFFF); // create a graphics from the canvas var g:Graphics = new Graphics(); d0c515b9f4
