The Apple Watch has a new app for cardio — but that might not be a good thing. If you’ve ever walked on a treadmill, you know that you can get your workout in without breaking a sweat. That’s because the conscious act of exercising, a.k.a. “physical activity,” is a bit of an oversimplification. We know how to move, but can we learn how to move well? And if we’re to learn, we need to work with some of the people who’ve learned before us — otherwise, our industry could fall into a downward spiral of mediocrity. That’s one takeaway from a new

Apple Watch app, called Move to Move, that’s designed to take on your go-to sport of choice: running. The app, which debuted on iOS 10.2, allows your iPhone's pedometer to adjust its pedometer so that it tracks your speed, and includes guided exercises to help you get a great sweat (well, a great sweat that doesn't feel like torture). The end result is a simple process that, at least in theory, can improve your fitness without you even knowing it. The other takeaway is that it might not be the best thing for everyone. For starters, users need to get on board with the notion of the "simplified" or "less-intense" fitness goals that Apple has made a cornerstone of its health initiatives. For example, Apple is promoting its Activity app, which is aimed at helping
