The Journal of Philosophy and Phenomenological Research, 95 (2), (2016), 153–166 Abstract John de Sousa's relational theory of individuality is one of the major philosophical alternatives to the view that individuality is grounded in substantial properties. On this relational conception, individuals are understood to have properties that exist relative to their relationship with others. In this essay, I argue that while this approach to individualism is appealing, it has significant flaws. The most serious of these is that it conflates relational properties with substantive ones. I argue that the standard examples from which the relational theory draws its examples do not actually support the idea that individualism rests on the concept of relational property. I will argue that the relational conception of individuality is not compatible with the intuition that human individuals possess substantial properties such as consciousness or free will. I will also suggest that the appeal of the relational theory derives from a confusion between two distinct usages of the term'relational'. The first is a descriptive claim about the way in which individuals make their contributions to social life. The second involves making the assumption that a universal form of individuality is guaranteed by relationality. However, de Sousa later recanted this position in favour of an individualism based on the metaphysical notion of individual substance. I argue that the motivation behind the move to substance was simply epistemic. It was driven by the recognition that the descriptive characterization was problematic. I will suggest that individualism may be best understood as the doctrine that human individuals are 6d1f23a050
