The ideal tool to test the contrast of your website, application or image. Features: Counts the number of colors in your design. Uses WCAG 2.0 success criteria for color contrast Reliable and easy to use. Portable application, no install required. Saves results. It is a free tool. Created by the designer Bruno Sawaya. How much readability is enough? The WCAG 2.0 document which covers the topic of contrast offers a two-tiered classification for such kind of analysis. The first level of the guidelines, which applies to any visual content, is called a baseline level, and this states the limits that may be used by designers. The second level of the guideline refers to the ideal for the content, and this is known as an improved level. The document makes it clear that while a baseline is to be achieved in order to make a content accessible, the ideal should be in the range of 80 to 100 percent. You can find a detailed explanation about the background behind this topic as well as how the color contrast checker can make it possible on this post on WebAIM. Ways of making use of the application As was explained above, the tool's aim is to measure the baseline level for the colors in your design. The rest of the feature list is related to the improved level, and this is where the program comes in handy. It is possible to check any chromatic element of your design (image, page, or window) against the test scenarios of the WCAG guideline, with the results having a compact report that informs you about the pass or fail assessments and what your design looks like through the eyes of people suffering from color blindness. In order to test your design's color contrast, you need to select a color for the foreground as well as the background, with the possibility of having to resort to the integrated color picker or a palette so that you can select different variations of the selected colors. After you have made your choice, the tool applies the success criteria, and you get to know how your design scores against its WCAG 2.0 requirements, which the document states are "in line with international Web standards, such as the World Health Organization (WHO) and World Information Technology Alert (WITA) color contrast recommendations." In other words, the tool is perfect for ensuring that your design is
