Paediatric arterial pulmonary hypertension is characterised by mean pulmonary artery pressure ≥ 25 mmHg in patients with normal systemic ventricular function. Patients need to be evaluated and treated in a multidisciplinary setting. Right heart catheterisation is required for diagnosis and to ensure suitability for percutaneous pulmonary valve implantation. The gold standard treatment for these patients is transcatheter pulmonary valve implantation (TPVI). TPVI is an alternative to surgical pulmonary valve replacement and has been shown to be safe and effective in selected paediatric patients. The overall success rate for TPVI has increased to nearly 100% after the initial learning curve and the survival to time of heart transplantation is similar to that seen in cardiac surgery. Although TPVI is now recommended for most patients with pulmonary stenosis, it is still not recommended for patients with systemic ventricular dysfunction or arterioportal communication. Percutaneous pulmonary valve implantation is gradually replacing surgery as the first-line intervention in children with pulmonary stenosis and is an alternative for patients who fail surgery. Future research will focus on ways to identify and treat patients with persistent pulmonary hypertension after repair to increase the survival of these patients.

1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to electrical connectors for fabricating electrical contacts that penetrate a mating connector and that are reinforced for resisting destructive forces.
2. Description of the Prior Art U.S. Pat. No. 4,484,945 describes a connector having a plurality of pins that are arranged to be inserted into a mating connector to make electrical contact with the mating connector. The pins penetrate a body of insulating material that surrounds the pins and that is molded onto the ends of the pins. The insulating material is molded to leave a groove between the end of the pin and the body of insulating material. The body of insulating material reinforces the ends of the pins and eliminates the need to bond the pins to the body of insulating material. In addition, the indentation that is formed in the body of
